

Only a time machine could give you a better picture of America's past.

Short of time travel, primary sources best portray the events and ambience of the past.

And when it's America's past you're studying, we have the most comprehensive selection of relevant primary sources available: some 18,000 American books and periodicals written from the discovery of the New World through the dawn of the 20th century.

An Assessment of Community Power

Based on a study of nearly 2,000 respondents in Detroit, this book provides the first definitive analysis of the comparative structure of black and white neighborhoods. The author shows how and why the black ghetto is unique in terms of the functioning of local neighborhoods, community groups, and status processes; and he reveals the important implications of this difference for community action and the effective use of public programs.

JOURNAL OF WOMEN IN CULTURE AND SOCIETY

A new quarterly from The University of Chicago Press, SIGNS: JOURNAL OF WOMEN IN CULTURE AND SOCIETY will provide an international forum for research and scholarship about women. The journal is devoted to the latest thinking in a range of areas—the social sciences, arts and humanities, biology, psychology, law—presenting original papers, discussion, extensive review articles, and translations of important work published abroad.

The first issue will appear in Autumn 1975 with articles by Hanna Papanek, Carroll Smith-Rosenberg, Elizabeth Hardwick, and others, and with the first English translation of selections from Julia Kristeva's Des Chinoises. A supplementary issue in December will focus on occupational segregation—its social institutions, historical roots, and economic dimensions as well as current policy issues and goals; with papers and commentary by eminent economists, historians, and others.
