

The Grand Cayman Island Anole (Anolis conspersus) is one of several species that should benefit from land protection for the Blue Iguana (see article on p. 166). This green variant is typically found in the western portion of the island, in George Town and around the airport. The western populations have been considered by some to represent a subspecies distinct from populations to the east. This individual was photographed far to the east of where lizards of this color phase are usually found, possibly after having "hitched a ride" on a car.
